David Feingold is an associate in the Miami, Florida, office of Jackson Lewis P.C. His practice focuses on employment litigation and advising employers on a variety of workplace issues.

David represents clients in both federal and state courts, as well as before administrative agencies, including the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, California Division of Labor Standards Enforcement, California Department of Fair Employment and Housing, and Florida Commission on Human Relations. He has experience in a broad spectrum of cases, ranging from single and multi-plaintiff discrimination, harassment, and retaliation matters, to non-compete matters, to complex wage-and-hour class actions.

David developed interest in employment law as a first-year student at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, while researching and drafting on employment issues for a legal writing class. David was particularly intrigued by the breadth of topics falling within the employment law umbrella, the unique fact patterns that lent themselves to highly analytical and creative solutions, and the practice area's applicability to all industries and professions.

While a second-year law student, David published a note in the Cardozo Journal of Law and Gender, where he subsequently served as a notes editor.
