Holly has decades of experience representing clients in lawsuits alleging violations of virtually all employment laws including Title VII, the FMLA, the ADA, and the ADEA. She has represented clients in trials before juries and judges in state and federal courts, administrative agencies and the American Arbitration Association. Holly also counsels employers on various employee relations matters throughout the life cycle of employment, including leave management, paid sick leave laws, internal complaints, retaliation concerns, and related matters.

In addition to her litigation and counseling practice, Holly specializes in multi-state reductions in force and internal investigations. Her approach is a practical one: Holly works closely with clients to understand their business and their risk tolerance and she works tirelessly to achieve the desired result. Holly represents companies with the understanding that the lawyer-client relationship is about much more than defending litigation; it is a business partnership that requires transparent communication, trust, and mutual respect.
